This digital sheet music for "Blue and White Porcelain" is a theme from a Chinese movie of the same name. The sheet music is written in Jianpu-numbered notation. You'll get the same version as played in Bei Bei's video, and you'll receive an email with a link to download it after placing your order. If you're having trouble learning this piece, be sure to check back to Bei Bei's video for help. Once you've finished playing "Blue and White Porcelain," you might want to learn another song - we have many digital titles to add to your musical library, as well as physical books that can be shipped to you. Numeric or cipher notation is used to represent notes with numbers, each representing a note in a specific key. Unlike staff notation, an individual number could represent any pitch. To identify which note is represented by each number, the player needs to know the key the music is in. Guzheng music in cipher notation is usually written on a movable do scale. This means that while "1" is always referred to as Do, the pitch of the note depends on the key the song is in. For example, songs in the key of D use 1 to represent D, and songs in the key of G use 1 to represent G. Pitch increases with number - a 6 is a higher pitch than a 1. Numbers 8 or higher refer to physical strings on the instrument, not notes. A 0 indicates a rest. If you see letters replacing numbers, it's likely koto notation. Guzheng are typically tuned so that unmodified strings produce notes on a pentatonic scale. The five open strings of an octave are notated as 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6. A 4 is played by pressing a 3 string with the left hand to raise its pitch by a half step, while a 7 is played by pressing a 6. If you're looking for guzheng sheet music, there are many resources available. Guzheng.cn is a top recommendation, allowing you to search for sheet music as well as recordings and videos to learn from. You can start by searching for songs on the Repertoire page and clicking the "Guzheng.cn" link in the search results. This will take you directly to a search for that song on guzheng.cn. Here are some additional options for finding guzheng music besides guzheng.cn. When searching for covers of TV and movie theme songs, popular music, or old classics, these sites really shine. However, finding covers of western songs can be more challenging. Physical music books are also a viable option. You can visit one of the stores listed on the Retailers page and order from them. Many stores offer collections of songs, learning materials, and practice exercises. Keep in mind that you don't need to limit yourself to English; all you need is to be able to read the music. If you prefer English descriptions of what you're doing, there are 6 English titles available, with 3 being produced by US guzheng shops themselves. You can refine your search by using key phrases related to a character's name in both English and Chinese. Select the desired items, and then click "Add to Cart" to proceed to the checkout page.
